

SOCIAL AND PERSONAL

Congressional Reception at White House to Be Event of Week—President and Mrs. Roosevelt Enthusiasts.
Paint Brush Wielders in Diplomatic Corps.

ANOTHER state reception at the White House this coming Thursday will be the chief social function in the official circle. The affair will be in honor of the members of Congress and their wives.

As the number of invitations to be given out has already reached the limit, it is expected it will be a large and brilliant event, and that Senators and Representatives well known socially will be there for the honor of the body they represent. Strange as it may seem, most of them appear to care to attend only the diplomatic reception, and apparently take no interest in the function given especially for them.

A Congressional reception is often more or less like "Hamlet" without the royal Dane, the members of Congress best known being usually conspicuous for their absence.

Though it would seem that the President and Mrs. Roosevelt have been written of from every point of view, and every characteristic of theirs expatiated upon, there is still a side of their characters no one, as far as known, has ever depicted. That is their appreciation and love of art.

There is seldom an exhibit, either at a club or at the Corcoran Gallery of Art, that one or both do not attend.

There have been several such exhibits at the Cosmos Club. Both the President and Mrs. Roosevelt have gone to see the pictures. In one or two instances their appreciation of the artists' subjects and work has been so enthusiastic as to lead to the painter giving them a copy of his work, the particular painting they seemed to care for most.

On other times the President has been a purchaser. Mrs. Roosevelt, accompanied by Miss Ethel and a friend, was recently at the exhibition now going on at the Corcoran, the Washington Water Color Club's exhibit. Both the President and Mrs. Roosevelt attended the exhibit of Mr. Max Weyl, given there recently.

While much has been said of the congeniality existing between the President and the French Ambassador, M. Jusserand, on account of their mutual love of tennis, it is perhaps unknown that both have an interest in common in their love of art. M. Jusserand is a painter himself of no mean skill. Several charming water-colors from his hand adorn the walls of the embassy.

Miss Langham, sister of the Baroness von Sternburg, is another clever amateur in the capital's smart set. Miss Langham has always been more inclined to the serious side of life than to the merely amusing, and study of all kinds appeals to her. A serious study of art is included in her pursuits. Her brush has many clever results to its credit.

The diplomatic corps, it is thus seen, has two clever exponents of the artistic, and until recently had still a third. The former Spanish Minister, Senor Ojeda, was a clever water-colorist. His portfolio of sketches, taken here and there in his travels, was a delight to the artistically inclined. His Moorish sketches were particularly pleasing.

The home of former Senator and Mrs. John B. Henderson is a gallery of pictures in itself. The chateaufort of the mansion is an art patron. Every available space in her home is covered with pictures, and many are fine.

Mr. and Mrs. George Marye also have a fine collection and are later to build an addition to their home, at Connecticut avenue and N street, which will form a gallery in which to hang their always increasing collection.

An article which appeared in a New York daily lately was interesting to the dog and cat lover. It had to do with the philanthropy of a woman in one of Boston's suburbs who is to found a cemetery for dogs.

Mrs. G. H. Shapley, of Newtonville, owner of the late Pinkie, who was the smallest dog in the world, has this distinctive pet with six others, buried in a vacant lot behind her house. It is her wish to lay out here a dog cemetery like the one in Paris.

This place of ground is similar to the field in France's capital, where the nobility and gentry bury their pets. It slopes like it to a small lake and could easily be beautified.

London, too, has its animal cemetery. Here cats and dogs and even monkeys are laid to rest. This little burying ground is in Hyde Park, near one of the entrances, and is so small a part of the famous park as to be often passed by the tourist.

The Duke of Cambridge, as head of the park commission of England, was privileged on the death of a favorite dog to bury his pet in whatever public park he chose. And so he laid to rest his little friend under one of the spreading trees of this beautiful park in the heart of London's fashionable center.

Some friends, hearing of this, on the death of their pets, craved the privilege from his lordship of placing their dogs and cats beside his pet's grave. So the little cemetery grew till it became an acknowledged burying ground for the pets of those who moved in court circles.

Washington's quota of diplomats has among it many men who served their governments in England before being accredited to this post. One or two have told of little pets, both cats and dogs, left behind under the trees of Hyde Park. They naturally are in sympathy with the idea of Mrs. Shapley to found a dog cemetery, as are other dog lovers of the Capital.

There is, of course, a fashion in dogs as in everything else, in the elite circles. In other words, "Every dog has his day."

The dog who is "in" at present is the Pomeranian. The perky, woolly little canine is seen with many of Washington's fashionable women.

The Vicomtesse de Marcell, the Baroness Hengelmüller, Mrs. Henry Corbin, Mrs. Grant Watson, of the British Embassy, and Mrs. Gillespie, wife of Gen. Gillespie, are some of the ladies who are seen almost everywhere with Pomeranians. All are black, with the exception of Mrs. Gillespie's "Bambino," which is a shade of brown.

The Belgian Minister, Baron Moncheur, gives his affection to cats, and has one or two fine specimens. The baron is also fond of monkeys. The hand-organ man who stops before the legation is sure of a gratuity, and the monkey a bit of candy or a handful of nuts.

There are other men of the corps who are fond of animals and have their pets, but are a bit shy of letting any but their intimate friends know of their fond.
